

FEW OLD PARTY CHIEFS-ARE LEFT

Young Men Are Now in Control.

Many Big Leaders in Republican Ranks Have Been Called.

Past Eight Years Has Made Many Changes Among the Old Hands.

NEW YORK, Nov. 7.—When Senator Scott shut his desk at the Republican National headquarters Saturday night and left the office for good, having closed up the work of the speakers' bureau, he did it with a reminiscent sigh, because he had announced to his associates on the committee that he proposed to abandon active political work for the future. This declaration by the West Virginia Senator brings to mind the fact that there has been an extraordinary change in the personnel of the Republican party so far as the active management is concerned.

Many Changes in Eight Years.

It was only eight years ago that McKinley ran for the Presidency the first time, and yet in this period of only two Presidential administrations the mortality among the big men of the Republican party has been astonishing, and with it there has come a general retirement of the old party chieftains so that today an entirely new generation is in control of the destinies of the Republic so far as the Republican party is concerned.

Great men drop off just as little men do, but it does seem as if they went in waves, because the most casual memories of the last eight years will serve to show that almost every prominent actor in the dramatic campaign of 1896 is off the stage of active politics and a lamentably large number of them have been removed by death.

A young, spectacled man who was a clerk in the White House when McKinley was first elected is now chairman of the Republican National committee, and the present candidate for the Presidency was only too glad to get an under secretaryship at the beginning of the first McKinley administration.

Young Men Run Campaign.

This campaign has been run by young men almost exclusively. Mark Hanna has been succeeded by Cortelyou and Joe McKinley has been almost forgotten in the vigor of the administration of Elmer Dyer as secretary of the great party organization. The same process has been going on in the various State committees. In the local representatives on the national committee, and to an even greater extent among the men of national reputation, who only a few years ago were as familiar figures on the streets of Washington as in their own homes in various parts of the country.

It is not necessary to convert this dispatch into a mere obituary record or to go over the catalogue of the great men who have passed away. But a visit to the Republican headquarters in Chicago and in New York, coupled with various trips about the country, brings to mind irresistibly the thought that a complete revolution in the controlling personnel of the Republican party has been effected within a number of years so few as to be counted on the fingers of one's hands.

Allison a Lonely Exception.

When the preliminary campaign opened in the winter and spring of 1898, Thomas B. Reed, William B. Allison and William McKinley were the three chief candidates for the Presidency. Reed was the incumbent, and it was the principal fight between Reed and McKinley. Both of them are gone. Allison remains the dignified and venerated "father of the Senate," but his influence in the councils of the Republican party has largely disappeared, and he contents himself with one personal adviser of one President after another from his point of vantage at the head of the United States Senate.

McKinley's running mate in the memorable campaign of 1896, Garrett A. Hobart of New Jersey, also is gone. Hobart had an intimate relation for many years with the management of one campaign after another. He belonged distinctively to what was known as the "boss" crowd on the national committee. That is to say, he belonged to the generation of political managers represented by Tom Platt of New York, Matt Quay of Pennsylvania, Henry Payne of Wisconsin and John Tanner of Illinois. They have all passed out of life since the National election of eight years ago, which, it must be admitted, is an extraordinary mortality for a party which is professedly the organization of young and progressive men.

Hanna and Tom Reed Gone.

Mark Hanna died at the same hotel in Washington and under the same circumstances as Tom Reed. The illness of both these men, who in their own persons represented the two most antagonistic elements in the Republican politics, was short, sharp and decisive. McKinley died a few days in each case brought about an end to their political and their earthly labors.

Henry C. Payne, who was vice-chairman of the National committee and who had left his impress on Republican politics to a large extent before 1896, died at the same hotel, although his illness was a more lingering one, and although the end was forestalled through a long period of ill health.

There was a Senatorial coterie in those days which has vast amount of influence on the party management in the different States, and, of course, in the National committee. Itally John Sherman, Matt Quay, McMillan of Michigan, Gear K. Davis of Vermont and Cushman K. Davis of Minnesota, all have been taken away since the St. Louis convention of eight years ago.

Notables Now Retired.

Many other men who had national reputations at that time and who were dependent upon to do a great deal of the hard work of the party have drifted out of active service and today really have little to do with the detail management of the National campaign.

Clarkson of Iowa was then the personal campaign manager for Senator Allison, and he had been for a dozen years one of the most trusted men at headquarters, no matter who happened to be running for President. Now he is survivor of the port of New York, but while his advice constantly is sought in a National campaign, he no longer appears in the active management of the campaign.

Teller of Colorado both left the party for good and destroyed their own personal influence thereby.

Senator Chandler of New Hampshire, who was associated with the party management from Hayes to McKinley, and who sat in the Cabinet in the meantime, was defeated for re-election to the Senate and now he is minor but lucrative position on the commission which is settling the Spanish war claims with becoming deliberation.

Hawley a Confirmed Invalid.

Senator Hawley of Connecticut, once an aggressive factor at headquarters, has been in actual retirement for a long while, owing to the complete failure of both mind and body, and the Connecticut member of the National committee in the old days, Sam Essenden of Stamford, is the leading candidate for the vacancy.

TWO WOMEN FIGHT A DUEL

Desperate Fight Near Fort Bridger.

Revolver and Shotgun Were the Weapons Used in Affair.

Both Participants Are Wives of Ranchers; Only One Wounded in the Contest.

EVANSTON, Wyo., Nov. 8.—Mrs. Leon Demars, shot in a duel by her neighbor, Mrs. Nancy Richards, is dead. Several times the women had come to blows, and each had warned the other the next encounter would be with guns.

Open Fire on Each Other.

Mrs. Demars went to Mrs. Richards' ranch, near Fort Bridger, and, upon being ordered away, displayed a big revolver. Mrs. Richards had been carrying a weapon in expectation of meeting Mrs. Demars. Mrs. Richards says Mrs. Demars fired first, but there were no other witnesses.

Bullet in Her Breast.

At the second shot Mrs. Demars fell, with a bullet in her breast, but kept on firing, emptying the revolver. Mrs. Richards also fired six shots. Both are wives of ranchers. They are thirty years old. Mrs. Richards was arrested.

Apparently Dead Man Astonishes Coroner in a Morgue.

OMAHA, Nov. 8.—In the morgue in this city a man, apparently dead, suddenly threw off the sheet with which he was covered and, with a groan loud enough to be heard half a block away, sat bolt upright on the slab on which he had been laid out, looked into the faces of the coroner's jury, which had been impaled to inquire into the cause of his death, and asked what was going on.

A stranger who, from papers on his person, was believed to be James Black, a bricklayer from Cedar Rapids and Ottumwa, Ia., was found unconscious in the street by Thomas Grier, a night watchman for the Hoagland Lumber company. Beside him lay a half-empty bottle of ether.

The unconscious man was taken to Clarkson hospital and there at 1 o'clock he apparently expired. Coroner Bradley removed the body to the morgue and impaled the jury.

While the jury was conducting its investigation into the cause of death, Black rose as from the dead and struck horror into the hearts of the coroner and his jury. A physician was immediately summoned. He applied restoratives, but Black soon fell into unconsciousness again and died in a few hours.

HAD MANIA FOR HORSES.

Ohio Man Imagined Himself Owner of Livery Stable.

COLUMBUS, GROVE, O., Nov. 8.—Elmer Darling, a young man of Leipsic, has been committed to the Toledo State hospital for treatment.

Darling had a mania for horses and imagined himself the owner of the city livery. He hired out turnouts at will, and made contracts for the same. When the remains of a former Leipsic resident were brought there for burial, Darling met the funeral party and, believing he owned the livery, endeavored to eject the driver and funeral director, and drive the hearse himself. He refused to leave the seat on the hearse, and when forcibly removed cursed and acted like a madman. The relatives were frightened by the row on the hearse wherein reposed the remains of their loved one, and the women of the party nearly collapsed.
